

Not Quite Heaven

Melle Starsen

Jack Schuster died. At least, that's what it seemed like. And then his problems really began. He was barely over the shock of the transition from life when he was faced with a beautiful but hard-nosed angel who forced him to examine some of the major mistakes he made in his life, especially with his daughter. The angel also forced him to find out what he believed in. But what really infuriated Jack was being forced to work after he was dead. What was a lazy, self-centered dead man supposed to do? He argued, he debated, he threw temper tantrums, but all the while the angel pushed him to the limits of trust, belief and beyond. Life was never this hard. And if he had known death was going to be this difficult, he would have preferred to stay alive.
