Not illustrated. 1900 edition. Excerpt: ...she was of necessity left a good deal to herself. She began by thinking what an exceedingly gentlemanly man her brother was. In his ordinary working clothes he had been as much at his ease with those ladies as though he had been dressed in a city costume, which, however, would not have been nearly so becoming to him as his loose flannel shirt and broad straw hat. She then began to regret that her mind worked so slowly. If it had been quicker to act, she would have asked that young lady to come some day and go up in the haymow with her. It would be a positive charity to give a girl with longings, such as she saw that one had, a chance of knowing what real country life was. It would be pleasant to show things to a girl who really wanted to know about them. From this she began to think of Dora Bannister. Dora was a nice girl, but Miriam could not think of her as one to whom she could show or tell very much. Dora liked to do the showing and telling herself. I truly believe, said Miriam to herself, --and a slight flush came on her face, --that, if she could have done it, she would have liked to stay here a week, and wear the teaberry gown all the time, and direct everything--although, of course, I would never have allowed that. With a little contraction of the brows, she went into the hall, where she heard her brothers step. CHAPTER XXni THE HAVERLEY FINANCES AND MBS. ROBINSON it bothers the head off of me, said Molly Tooney to Mike, as she sat eating her supper in the Cobhurst kitchen, to try to foind out what thim two up-stairs is loike, anyway, specially her. Ive been here nigh onto two weeks, now, and I dont know her no bettther than when I fust come. For the life of me, I cant make out whether shes a gal-woman or a woman-gal...
